The engine was made by Ronaldson Brothers & Tippet, a major Australian manufacturer of small stationary engines and agricultural machinery that operated from 1905 until 1972. Ronaldson Tippet's rugged, reliable petrol and diesel engines were widely used on Australian farms, and many can now be seen at antique machinery shows. The company made engines for the Australian Army during World War 2, and after the war enjoyed some export success.

A rare (in UK) example of a Ronaldson, Bros and Tippet engine. In 1908, the Austral engine design was completely revamped incorporating several improvements reputed to have been copied from the popular English built Blackstone engines. Changes included the addition of a side shaft driven governor (replacing the belt driven governor), a pumped fuel supply (replacing a gravity feed), an improved vaporiser, and most importantly, a timing valve to accurately control the firing point.

He writes, 'It is a 3 HP Ronaldson-Tippet engine I restored. It was in a shocking mess when I recovered it from a pig farm near Echuca, Victoria and many parts were missing and had to be made. It is a lovely engine and attracts attention every time I take it to a rally.' Keith Denner also owns an American-made 'New Way', and is a reader of GEM.
